Some writers set daily word count or page goals; I find it simpler to commit to the amount of time I spend writing every day. The description clearly states it is a novella, therefore it is meant to be a short story.

Steinbeck's otherwisetimelessandplacelessfable, inwhichanimpoverish I recommend it. For Butler, writing in the late 19th century, that theory is Darwinian. Even if they were commenting on a chapter that eventually got deleted entirely, their insights rippled throughout the rest of the draft, and have shaped my novel for the better.
