Dante is concerned with human desire, but also with how we use language when we deal with desire. Dante places them in the second circle of his Inferno, where sins of lust are punished, in this case by the lovers being joined forever and carried about by powerful winds.

The efficacy of both the Word of God and the words of man, the permeability of the border between the two, those characters perforce disappear at the borderline, where literature meets the voiceless reality of flesh and blood. Love has conducted us unto one death; Caina waiteth him who quenched our life! But at one point Alone we fell. Subscribe to: Post Comments Atom. In his lyric poetry Dante both supports the idea that Love is a compulsive force and also challenges that idea.
