So we can learn from our own history. Whilst all developing countries perceive In a race against time, ICT for education and development will be a critical factor in the coming years. All countries engage in trade and all of them rely, for a substantial part on trade for their economy to grow and to fight poverty. And, as you have already gathered from the name of my organization, I will offer some thoughts on how the neo-liberal model has affected women and why any new thinking on development economics must ground itself in the most basic social organization humans have—male and female.

The OECD also works with developing countries on many fronts to support them in enabling the integration of the sectors involved in the deployment of the tool.
